Greek and Roman Sculpture

The University Prints included in the present volume cover the history of Greek sculpture from its beginning in pre-Greek forms, — the so-called Mycenæan art, — down through the period of Roman patronage to the time when the decline of the Roman culture began to pave the way for the emergence of a new race personality in art. Not without difficulty have the beginning and the end been determined, for in art, as in all natural developments, there is no known beginning or end. The choice must therefore be arbitrary and based on convenience.

The relation of Greek art to earlier art developments is somewhat uncertain, but all will agree that the civilization known as Mycenæan, Minoan or Ægean, which preceded the Hellenic civilization in the same area and was displaced by a process which plainly involved much assimilation, stands in a very vital relation to the subsequent Greek development. Just what that development was is less easy to determine, but it is imperative that some hint of the character of that art should be given in a study of Greek beginnings.

It is equally certain that the Greek was indebted to the Egyptian, though how far and in what manner is a matter of much controversy. The editor of the present series is of the opinion that the dependence was less extensive and more indirect than some have assumed. In particular it is to be noted that the Egyptian influence was exerted, at least in some cases, through the medium of the Minoan art, the Minoans of Crete having been influenced by the Egyptians, and the Greeks in turn by the Minoans. Direct influence of Egypt on the Greeks themselves, though often surmised, seems incapable of proof. For this reason it has not been deemed advisable to include any examples of Egyptian sculpture in the present series. A limited series of carefully chosen subjects are included in Series M, and can be secured independently by those who desire them.

In this as in all issues of the University Prints, the aim is to illustrate truthfully and adequately the field covered rather than to make a selection of pretty things as defined by our transient taste. We are not responsible if the artists of an earlier age sometimes made things that do not interest us, or had ideals of beauty that seem to us unnatural. The very purpose of art study is to enlarge our ideals and escape from the bias and provincialism of our own time and place. We can never do this by gleaning from the art of other ages merely the things which seem to reflect present sentiments. Nowhere does this pernicious influence of provincial congeniality work more disastrously than in connection with Greek art. We must contemplate it broadly in all its aspects if we are to get its secret, and it is the testimony of all the ages that its secret is supremely worth getting.

It is for this broad and impartial survey that this series has been prepared. In both aim and character it is believed to be the only series which will prove satisfactory to the student, for it is the only collection of inexpensive material in this field which was prepared by a scholar for the use of students.

This adaptation to students' purposes has been farther assured by the publication of a "Handbook" prepared by the editor of the series. This is essentially a dictionary of information concerning the subjects reproduced in the series. When the character of these subjects is recalled, their uncertain and controverted authorship, their scattered location both now and originally, and the numberless questions of fact upon which our judgment and interpretation of them must often depend, the value of such a compendium must be apparent. The information here contained would otherwise be sought through a whole library in vain.

Entirely different in character is a second volume, "The Message of Greek Art" by H. H. Powers, Ph.D. This is "not information but interpretation," æsthetic and historical rather than archæological. The aim of the author has been to recreate the wonderful background of Greek history, social condition, poetry, and ideals, and to present Greek art as a perfectly natural reflection of these conditions. Only as we live our way back into Greek life, can we see in Greek art a living and meaningful thing.

The teacher who is equipped with these two books is prepared to make an effective use of these prints in class work. Much will depend, however, upon wisdom of selection. To a very large extent selections for instructional use are based on some form of acquaintance. It is interesting to note the immense advantage enjoyed by works located in the more accessible galleries of Europe. Teachers have visited London, Paris and Rome and their acquaintance with these collections influences their choice. Beyond this immediate acquaintance, there is the acquaintance based on books. A teacher's selections will usually betray the books upon which they are based. But books in their turn are based upon much the same limited acquaintance. Hence the unfamiliar collections suffer, to their and our hurt.

The present series may fairly claim to be comprehensive. No gallery of importance has been omitted. Important works are included from Copenhagen, Madrid, Palermo, Delphi, Cassel, Syracuse, Brescia, Beneventum, Mantua, and Constantinople, works which few teachers have ever seen and many of which are not reproduced in any work accessible to them. Yet many of these works are of surpassing beauty and exceptional significance. If once seen they will make their appeal.

This brings us to the point of our very earnest recommendation, namely, that the teacher should own this volume and consult it in making out class lists instead of relying upon a mere catalogue of titles. Who would ever choose No. 356, "Fragment of Grave Relief of a Warrior, Glyptothek Ny Carlsberg, Copenhagen," on that information only? Yet that is one of the most exquisite examples of this most beautiful department of Greek Art. Moreover, the touch of tender and dreamy sentiment in the face is eloquent of the spirit of its age, an age in which refinement had dulled the keen fighting edge of Marathon days and made men loath to respond to Demosthenes' call to arms against the crafty Philip.

The hope that the choice of material for class instruction may be based on an adequate knowledge of the material available is the chief reason for publishing these prints in bound form and at a price below that of the unbound prints. For teachers who use these prints in their classes a still lower price is made on certain volumes. The object is at all costs to facilitate the intelligent study of Greek Art and a real acquaintance with the material offered for that purpose.

A second object in publishing the prints in bound form is to meet the requirements of libraries. For purposes of reference and permanent shelf use, cut prints are of little value. On the other hand, in bound form, the University Prints offer advantages to libraries small and great. It is the ambition of every library to possess a collection of photographs, on such branches of art as are here presented. The five hundred subjects here included cannot be found in the photograph collection of any American library. Moreover, if secured, the series properly mounted and installed would cost a hundred times the price of the present volume. The comprehensiveness of the present series makes it valuable to the largest library. Its inexpensiveness makes it available for the smallest library whose resources preclude the possibility of a large and expensive collection. It is not claimed that prints of this size and character are the equal of photographs, but for the subject here under consideration the approximation is close.

In addition to the works here included, a complete representation of the Parthenon Frieze is published in three long plates. These are included as an appendix in the Handbook, but are also offered separately for class use.

All the prints in this volume are also published in individual form and are available in selections to suit the user.

NOTE. — Three subjects, not included in the original series but published later in response to special demand, are here included before the regular series under the numbers M 4, 5, and 6.
